With the rapidly adoption of mobile device, smartphone and tablet PC, thousands of mobile service come out in the market. The overall value of the mobile commerce industry rising dramatically goes with this trend. Moreover, mobile payment plays an important role in mobile commerce application. As a result, understanding consumers' perception of mobile payment is crucial for helping mobile operators to promote their services.

Mobile payments are starting to gain a foothold in the U.S. More and more retailers are enabling customers to use technologies such as Android Pay, Apple Pay and Samsung Pay. However, these payment apps are still relatively unknown and highly underutilized. When I discuss mobile payments with friends and colleagues, the conversation is very predictable. It goes something like this: "Oh, I don't know about that. It seems risky." There's a general lack of trust and people aren't willing to take that chance with their credit cards — but why?

Studies indicated that users' perception, innovation, and trust in mobile devices significantly influenced their intention to use mobile payment. In other words, mobile payment service providers can increase users' intention to use mobile payment by adopting corresponding marketing strategies.
